Background Information

Research shows that preparation grounded in a skills based clinical approach increases teacher retention and leaves teachers better prepared for the realities of the classroom. In an effort to improve the retention and effectiveness of novice teachers in high need schools, the New York State Education Department (NYSED) awarded $20 million to support the participation of 13 institutions (11 graduate and 2 undergraduate) in a Clinically Rich Teacher Preparation Pilot Program. These institutions partnered with high need schools with demonstrated shortages of certified teachers to address the teacher shortage issue in New York State. Each of the 13 Clinically Rich Teacher Preparation Pilot Programs required intensive mentoring, supervision and support from the institution as well as the Local Education Agency (LEA), collaboration and integrated coursework and has a specific focus on the teacher shortage areas of science, mathematics, special education for middle and high schools and English as a Second Language.
